LORD FISHER, NOTED SEA FIGHTER, DEAD

Admiral Was to British Navy the Army.

London, July 10 .- Admiral John Arbuthnot Fisher, first Baron of Kilver-

Lord Fisher was to the British navy what Lord Kitchener was to the army At the outset of the war with Germany "Hell Fire Jack," as he was affection-Immediately after the wedding, on August 11 last, he and his bride went to the home of his mother. Prudence Duwas 72 years old and retired.

That the British navy was able to sweep the Kaiser's flag from the seas, blockade his coasts and reduce to im potency the great battleships and ar-mored cruisers upon which Emperor William and his people lavished such immense sums, is due more to Fisher than to any other man. He planned the ships, trained the officers and inspired the strategy that ruled the North Sea To him England looked for a great naval victory that would crown him a econd Nelson. He entered the British navy in 1854 as a boy of 13. He was born in Ceylor

the navy in an interview published in THE SUN less than a year ago, Lord Fisher said:

"There is no doubt that entering the avy before the days of the Britannia or her predecessor, the Illustrious, I think t was, and when one went straight to s seagoing ship, more especially when not having friends or money or family interest, it hardened and inured me at that plastic age to endure strife and get pachydermatous. What adjectives I did get in those stormy years from dom-ineering, dictatorial, demoniacal, sardonic, sinister, saturnine, ruthless, reentless and remorseless offcers!"

For a man who had done so much for his country, Lord Fisher was curiously unknown. His early services attracted little attention except from his superior officers and his great opportunity did not come until he was more than sixty years old. Then came the day when there was offered to him the greatest prize in a sailor's ambitien in time of peace—the office of First Sea Lord. But even that honor he would take nly on his own terms. He carried in his brain a full scheme of reorganization and believed the training and distribution of the navy to be perliously out of date. was apparent to him that the struggle for life and death in the future-this was in 1904—would be fought in the North Sea. Yet England's fleet was stationed as if the Mediterranean, as in th eighteenth century, would be the scene the crisis. He clearly stated his intentions and hey were approved by the Admiralty Then he proceeded to carry them out. Though constructive, his activities were evolutionary, and he was denounced or the sheer daring of the changes he ntroduced. Despite abuse and opposi he vastly increased efficiency while reducing expenses: He struck on of the estimates every penny which did not yield fighting value. He merclessly scrapped scores of weak vessels that ferred the men to real fighting ships. He created the system of nucleus crews. y which every ship in the reserve cou be mobilized for war within a few hours. Above all, he swung the whole fleet around to face the menace of the fature, until, in the words of Admiral ship strength was concentrated in or near home waters."

Hard Worker All His Life. All his life Lord Fisher was a hard worker. Here is an account of one of his typical days at sea mapped out by his flag licutenant:

5 A. M.—Rises. Writes hard until 7 Then walks around the ship. 8 A. M .- Breakfasts with chief of the Flag Captain. Flag Lieutenant,
